Not illustrated. 1919 Excerpt: .the whole year by arranging to take care of certain classes of work during the summer, when warm weather and low water conditions in streams are needed, while other work, such as tie renewals and much building work, with which the weather will not interfere, can be done in winter. On our line where the bridge department forces are separate from the building department, we have always arranged our bridge work so as to keep at least a moderate force employed steadily during the winter on work which can be done then as well as at any other time, and in that way always have a force available for use in case of emergency or special jobs of any kind. The question has frequently been raised in some quarters, whether it is not practicable to do all bridge work during the season of moderate weather and comparatively long days, and lay off the force during the winter, when the weather is unseasonable and the days are short. One objection to this is that in case of emergency, when all men are laid off, it takes considerable time to get a force of men together to make repairs. Another objection is it if the men are laid off in the winter they are apt to ce up other lines of work where they can be more steademployed and are not available when we need them the summer. It is difficult, if not impossible, to mainin a good,...
