But there are complexities and difficulties attending any comprehensive discussion of the subject. As a preliminary observation it would seem to be sufficiently obvious that some parallel should be established between pianoforte playing as a study subject and other branches of the public school curriculum. At first sight it would seem to be obvious that anything like the standardization of high school work in pianoforte playing should be preceded by equally definite standards of grade school work in the same subject. In other words, any course in piano playing relating itself to a high school course of study would seem to pre-suppose a preparation in pianoforte playing analogous to the preparation pre-supposed in other branches of study. But it is not clear that even this preliminary observation can safely be accepted as a premise or consistently followed to its logical conclusion. Chemistry, astronomy, and various other subjects are practically begun with the high school regime. At a superficial glance there would seem to be no good reason why the subject of pianoforte playing then begun should not receive like credit recognition. But here again difficulties beset the discussion. For there is grave question as to whether high schools, or any other schools or private teachers, can with propriety encourage persons of high school age entering upon the serious study of a subject, success or substantial attainment in which is almost invariably conditioned on early beginnings. For the indications of musical history...
